

Boston Apr. 14, 1858

Mr. Marsh.

The doctor arrived in Boston yesterday, and looked his name at the Quincy House (where I board) He usually stops here. As yet I have not seen him, but presume I shall soon. I wrote to you from Montpelier or somewhere on the way home, in regard to an architect by the name of Richards who was at M. at the time the commissions were deciding in regard to the design. If you remember Chepman down at Carenchish or Proctorsville was employed by Richards to work for him with the people of the town. I suspected that Powers would flee to him for refuge in the event that I did not side with and for him. He wrote a letter to Chepman as I wrote to you and sent it down in the same train that I went in. My opinion was that thinking he could no longer use me, he had written to Chepman to get him
