Marriage Suit Slated for Supreme Court

be denied to gays and lesbians. "This case involves one of the most fundamental of all our human and civil rights: the right to marry the person we love, the person with whom we want to share our lives," the couples said.

But then they went further, accusing the state of bigotry and discrimination even if those precise words were not used in the court documents. "The argument that the (couples') right to marry should be subject to legislative determination puts the Vermont attorney general in the embarrassing position of agreeing with the Virginia Supreme Court of 1966, which upheld a law against interracial marriage, claiming it was the province of the legislature, not the courts, to change the law," the couples said.

The U.S. Supreme Court ultimately overturned laws outlawing interracial marriage.

The couples' case boils down to the simple belief that society has changed and banning same-sex marriage is no longer reasonable. "In light of the changing social mores in the state of Vermont, it would be unjust and unreasonable to construe Vermont's marriage statutes to exclude same-sex couples," they said. Any other reading of the law, they said, would be unconstitutional.

Sorrell's response, summed up, was that the couples were misconstruing his response to the original suit. He said Vermont tradition and history, as well as the language of state laws, has limited marriage to one and one woman.

"Vermont's history and traditions do not support including same-sex unions within the fundamental right to marriage," the state said. "Marriage in this state has always been composed of one man and one woman."

Retaining the distinction between men and women for the purposes of marriage does not amount to discrimination, in the view of the state. "Whereas equality can provide members of both sexes with full educational and employment opportunities, it cannot change the biological fact that marriages require opposite-sex partners."

The attorney general suggested that the judge tell the couples that their case belongs not in the courthouse, but the Statehouse. "This is an issue best left to the legislature," he wrote. "(The couples') claims in this case involve complex and unresolved issues going to the core of human relationships, human nature and the structure of society."

Lippert Working for Change in the Community

Steve Howard was appointed, Bill was the only openly gay member of the Legislature. As a ranking member of the judiciary committee, Bill has used this position to build relationships as a gay man with both Republicans and Democrats on the committee. "I wanted to be on the judiciary committee because I knew that any law affecting our community was going to have to go through the judiciary committee, and I wanted to be right where I could be an influence on what happened." So far during his term he has seen the bill to make adoption by gays illegal voted down unanimously. He is certain that the bill to make gay marriage illegal will never go anywhere either.

Bill enjoys being an openly gay legislator very much because he gets to influence his fellow legislators, he gets to be there and be visible, and he gets to vote. As one of the more than 30 gay and lesbian elected officials from across the country invited to the White House a few years ago, Bill was able to meet with many of the Clinton Administration's top cabinet members. Even though controversy ensued surrounding the rubber gloves worn by some of the White House staff, Bill says the event was "a very significant step".

When asked what he believes to be the most pressing issue facing our GLBT community today, Bill maintains that there is a definite need to eliminate homophobia broadly. He also insists that the way to end discrimination of anyone is to find ways to get to know different types of people, and find some way to "get them in our lives". "I think one of the most realistic first steps [to ending discrimination] is to ask yourself where the group you're wanting to look at is in your life, and then ask yourself 'How can I seek out building some personal friendships?'"

Bill also believes that we are often hypercritical in our GLBT community, and that most likely because of our treatment by the rest of society we tend to easily turn on each other. "We shouldn't let ourselves become agents of the society's oppression of us, and have us do the damage to each other."

Because he is currently working for an establishment with most of its clientele in their early to mid teens, Bill takes a moment to reflect on the importance of nurturing the youth in our society, particularly in the GLBT community. "I think the GLBT young people of our state are our community's children. For those of us who don't have our own children, we can actually make a difference in the next several generations by making sure that the young people growing up today are treated as well as possible."

Taking a minute to talk about his own family, Bill describes an extremely supportive environment where he and his partner are always welcome. He recounts how his mother recently gave an interview about the Lippert family (complete with a retired United Methodist minister, two gay brothers and two very supportive siblings) to a local Harrisburg, Pennsylvania paper. "I love to watch my mother's 'coming-out' process too," he grins.

"I'd like to believe that we can eliminate homophobia in my lifetime." Bill says, and with more individual efforts such as his, this becomes all the more realistic.
