Bread & Puppet, Site of Queer Protest

was no help available for him.

Eventually, tempers cooled slightly as the two groups struck a compromise that allowed the protest to continue at a slightly greater distance from the stand. However, a representative of the Town of Greensboro, which owns the property on which the vendors were set up, arrived to insist that the group cease its protest altogether.

"This is not what Bread and Puppet is about," the woman exclaimed to incredulous onlookers. Stating that people should just go about their business without causing any disturbance, she demanded that the protest break up. "If you had a booth here, would you want them protesting you?" she asked of the crowd. "We live with that every day," was the response from a member of the group.

Many people expressed their appreciation at being educated about where their money was going. Others simply pushed passed the throng, determined to get coffee. The protestors were heartened by the significant number of straight people who expressed support for the protest.

A "Tribe" member specifically questioned Penn's sexuality. "Yes I am straight. When I had a conversation with a fellow [from the Island Pond group] he kept asking me if I was gay. I wouldn't tell him. I could tell that he was looking for a reason to label me demented and to dismiss my words."

The hot sun proved to be more effective than the security officers in breaking up the protest. After about an hour and a half, the crowd dwindled to just Penn and a few others who remained into the afternoon to spread the information.

One of Vermont CARES' clients said "I am a woman who has lived with HIV for over 16 years. One of the most difficult things for me has been trying to balance new hope with reality. The journey is not over. I have been feeling healthy for the last couple of years, and recently had a healthy baby boy. I did not do this alone. The support of my friends, family and Vermont CARES have helped make my dreams come true while I continue to battle HIV."
